

LITTLE CAT H
— AND THE —
GREAT PINK SPLAT
by Dr. Slop.

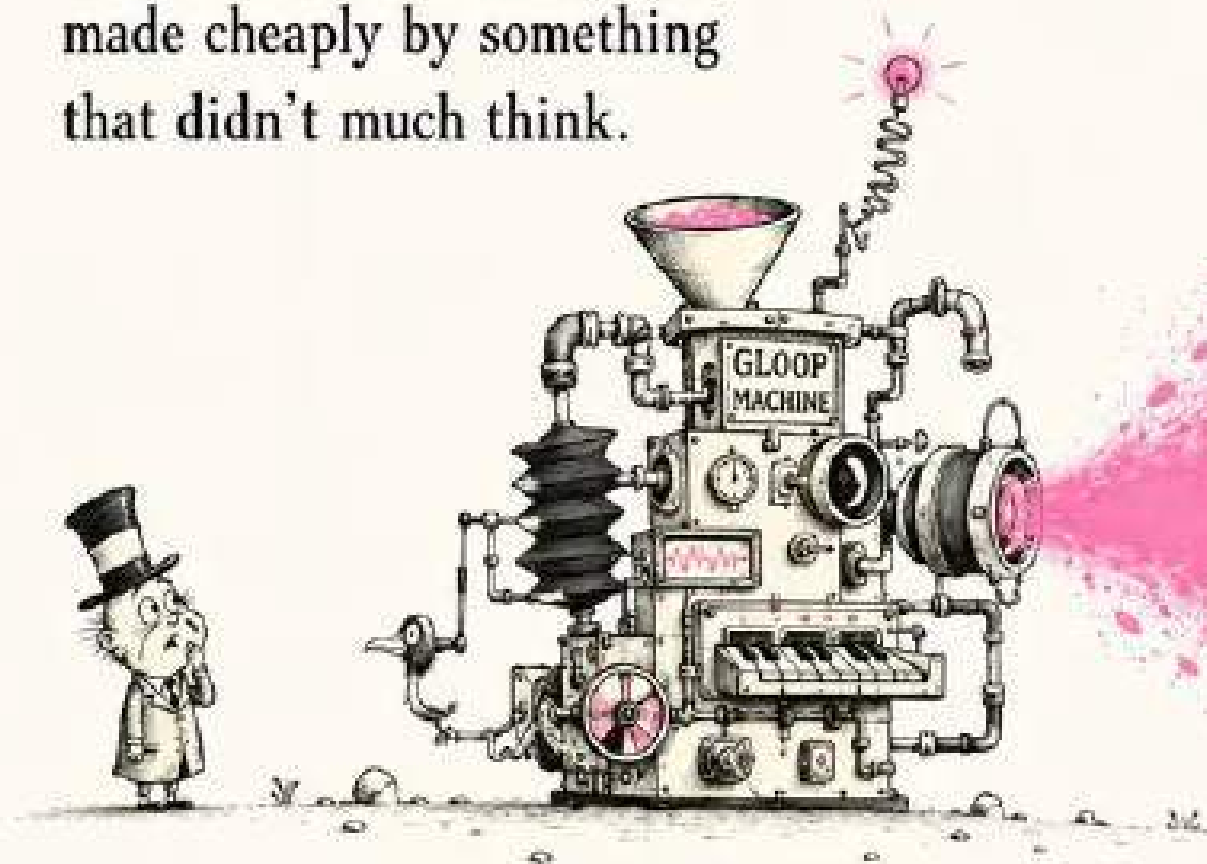

LITTLE CAT H
AND THE GREAT PINK SPLAT

by Dr. Slop

There once was a Splat
that was shiny and pink,
made cheaply by something that didn't much think.

And everyone saw it.
And everyone knew:
'That Splat is quite dreadful.
That Splat will not do.'

Then up came a Cat
with a camera and chair:

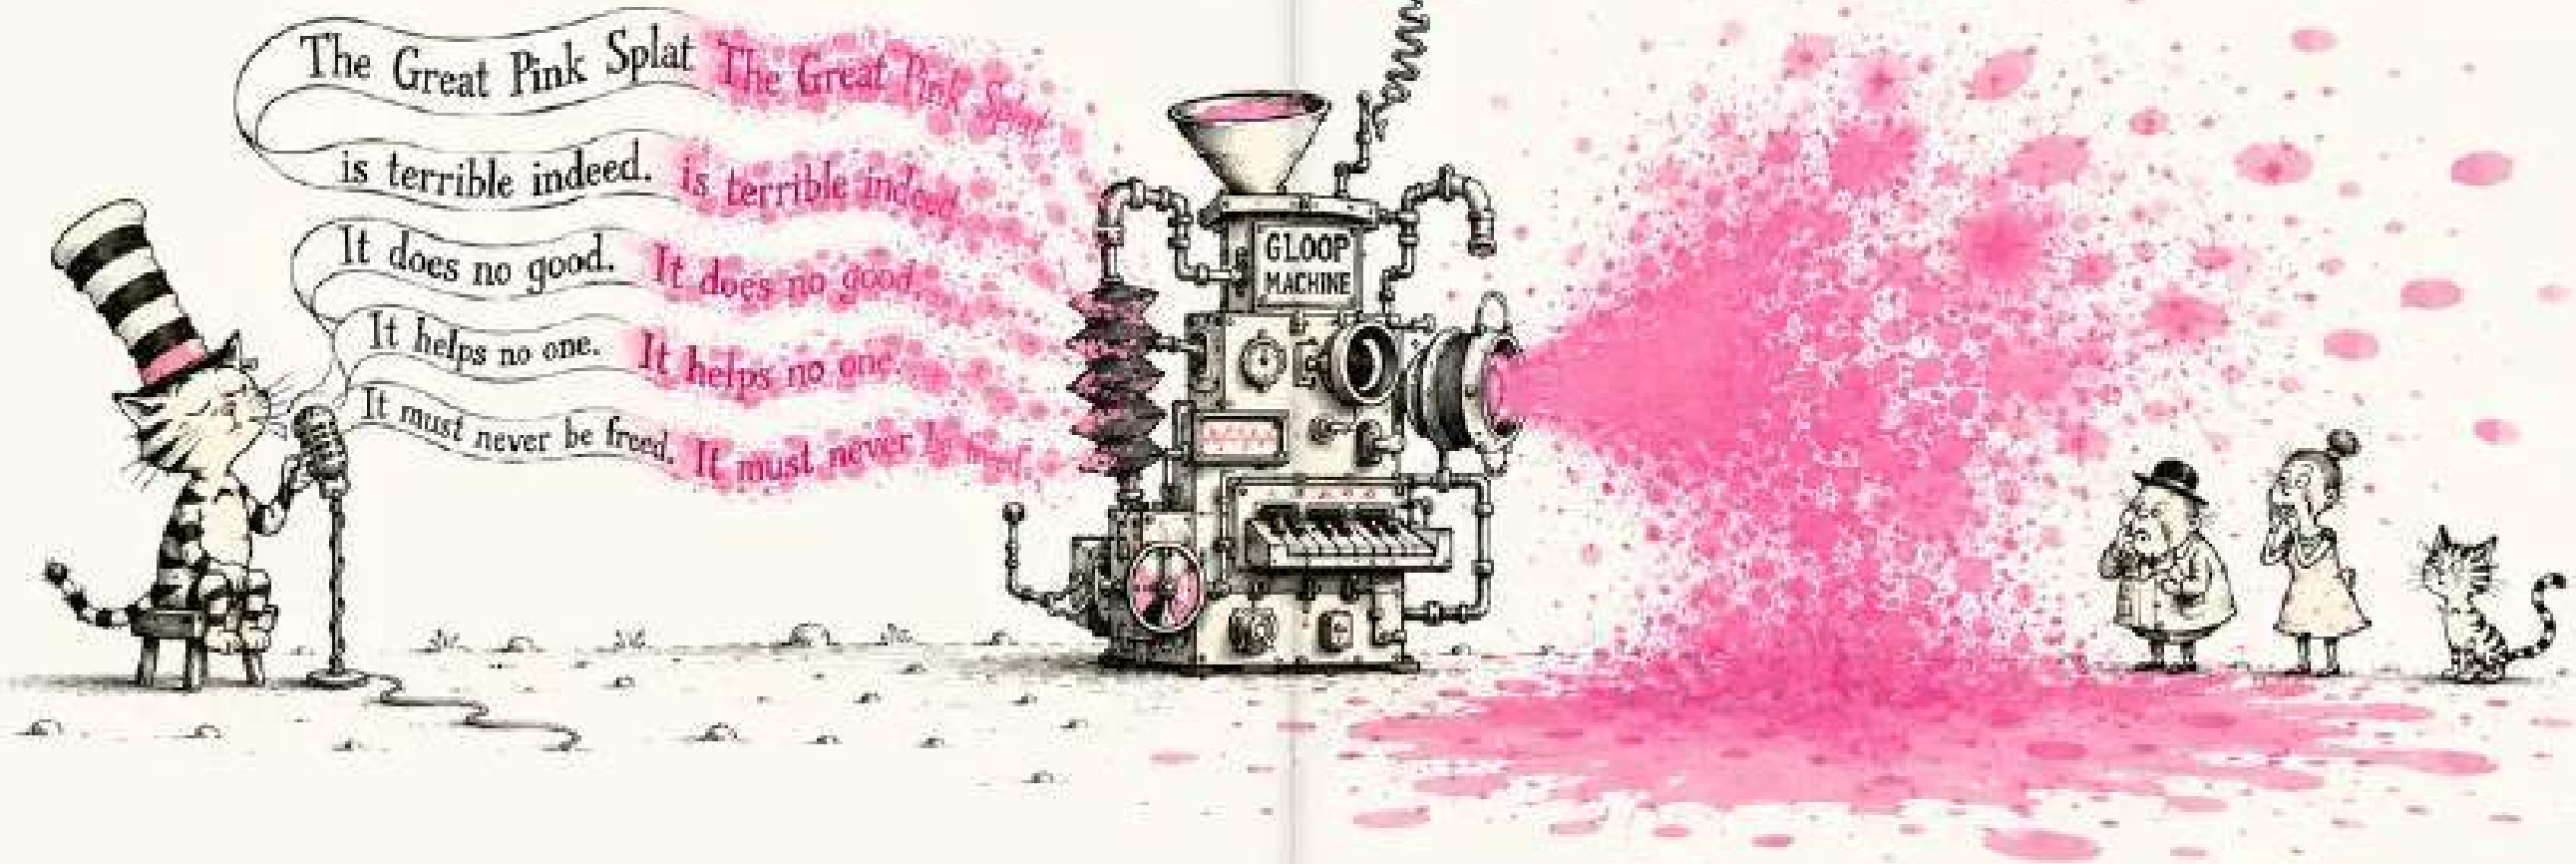

'I MUST tell the people
why THIS should not be there!'

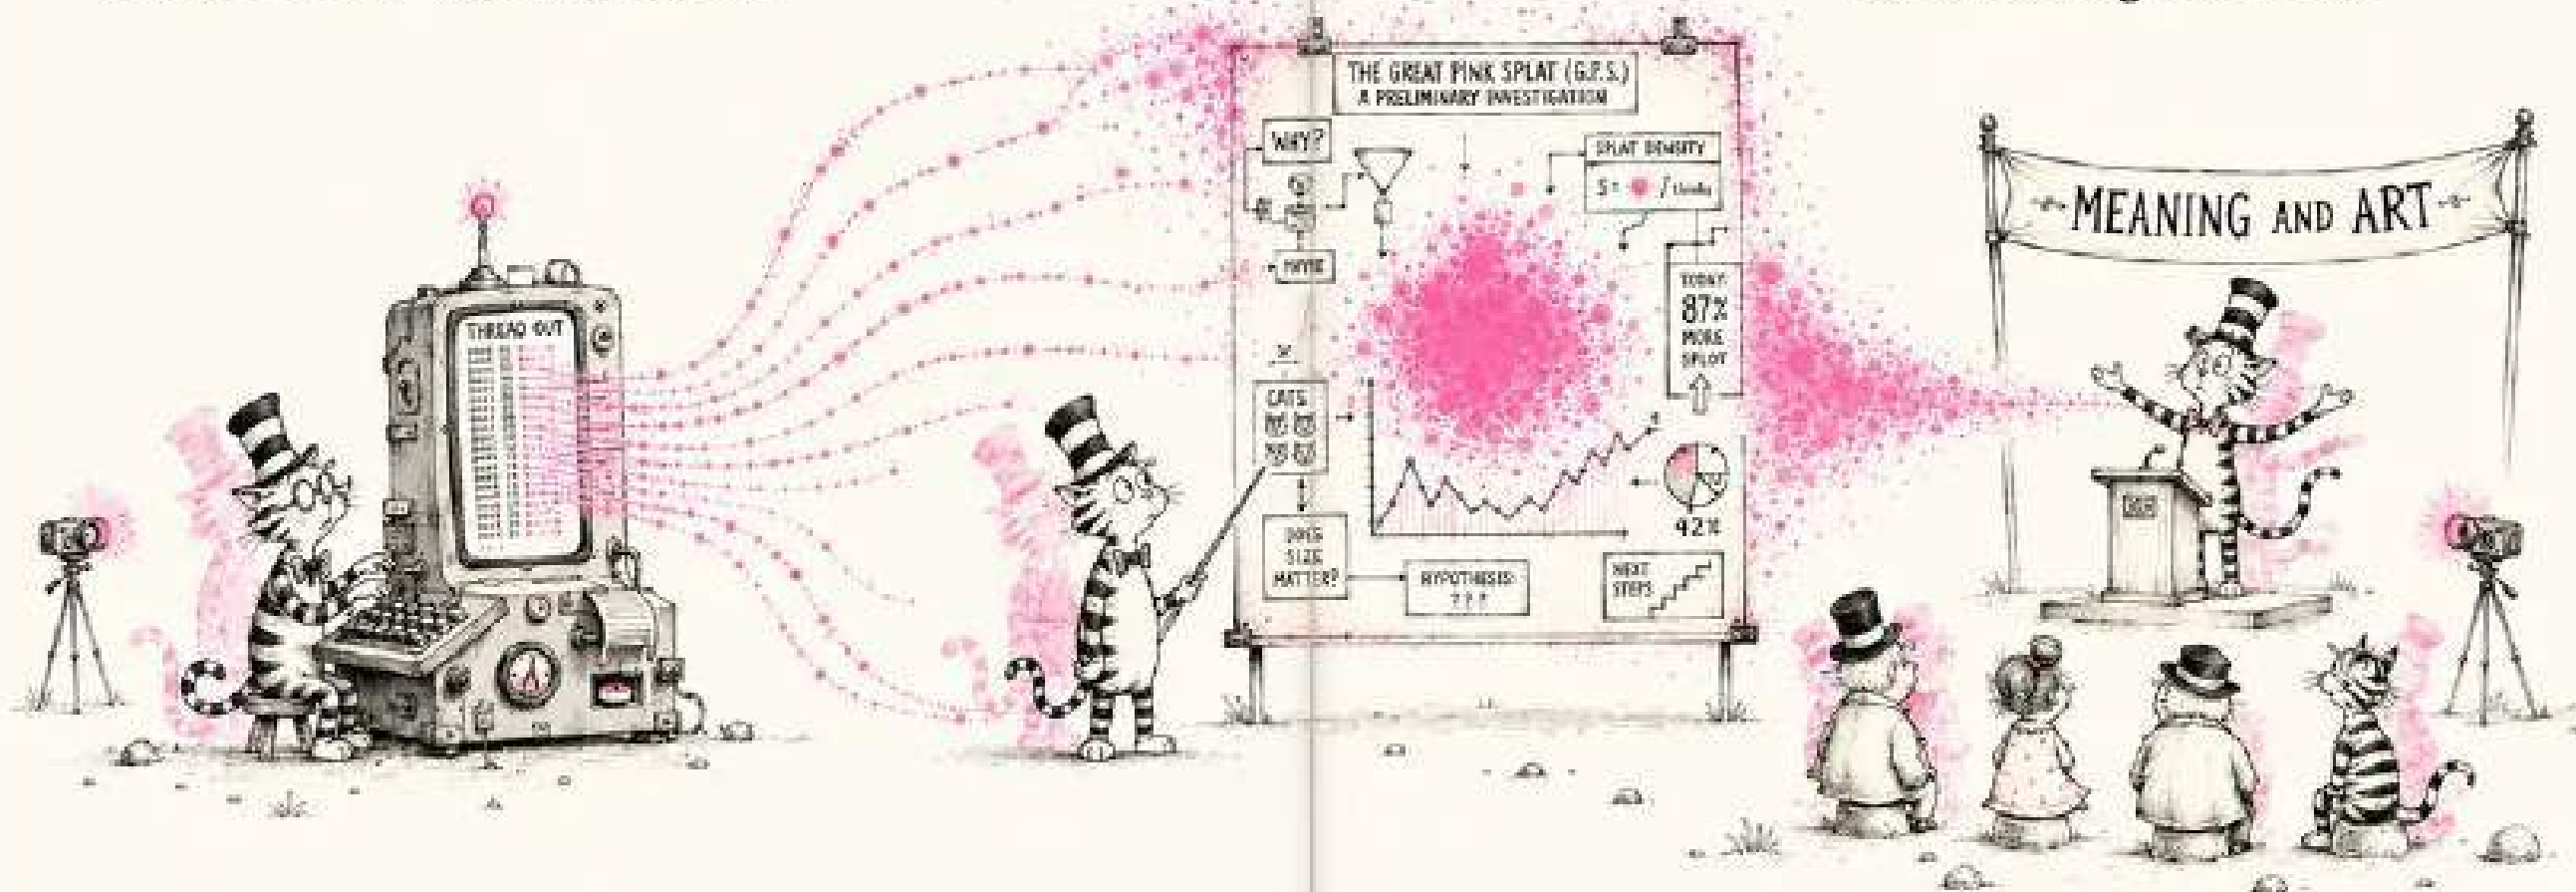

So he talked of the Splat
with importance and grace,

while the Splat from his talking spread all over the place.

Then Cat B wrote a thread.
Then Cat C made a chart.

Then Cat D gave a lecture on Meaning and Art.

Cat E checked the wording.
Cat F checked the facts.

Cat G made a podcast
on all of their acts.

And each little Cat,
from his hat to his toes,

thought everyone stank —
while HE smelled like a rose.

But the pink kept on spreading.
The pink did not quit.

For a hot take on shit
is still partly more shit.

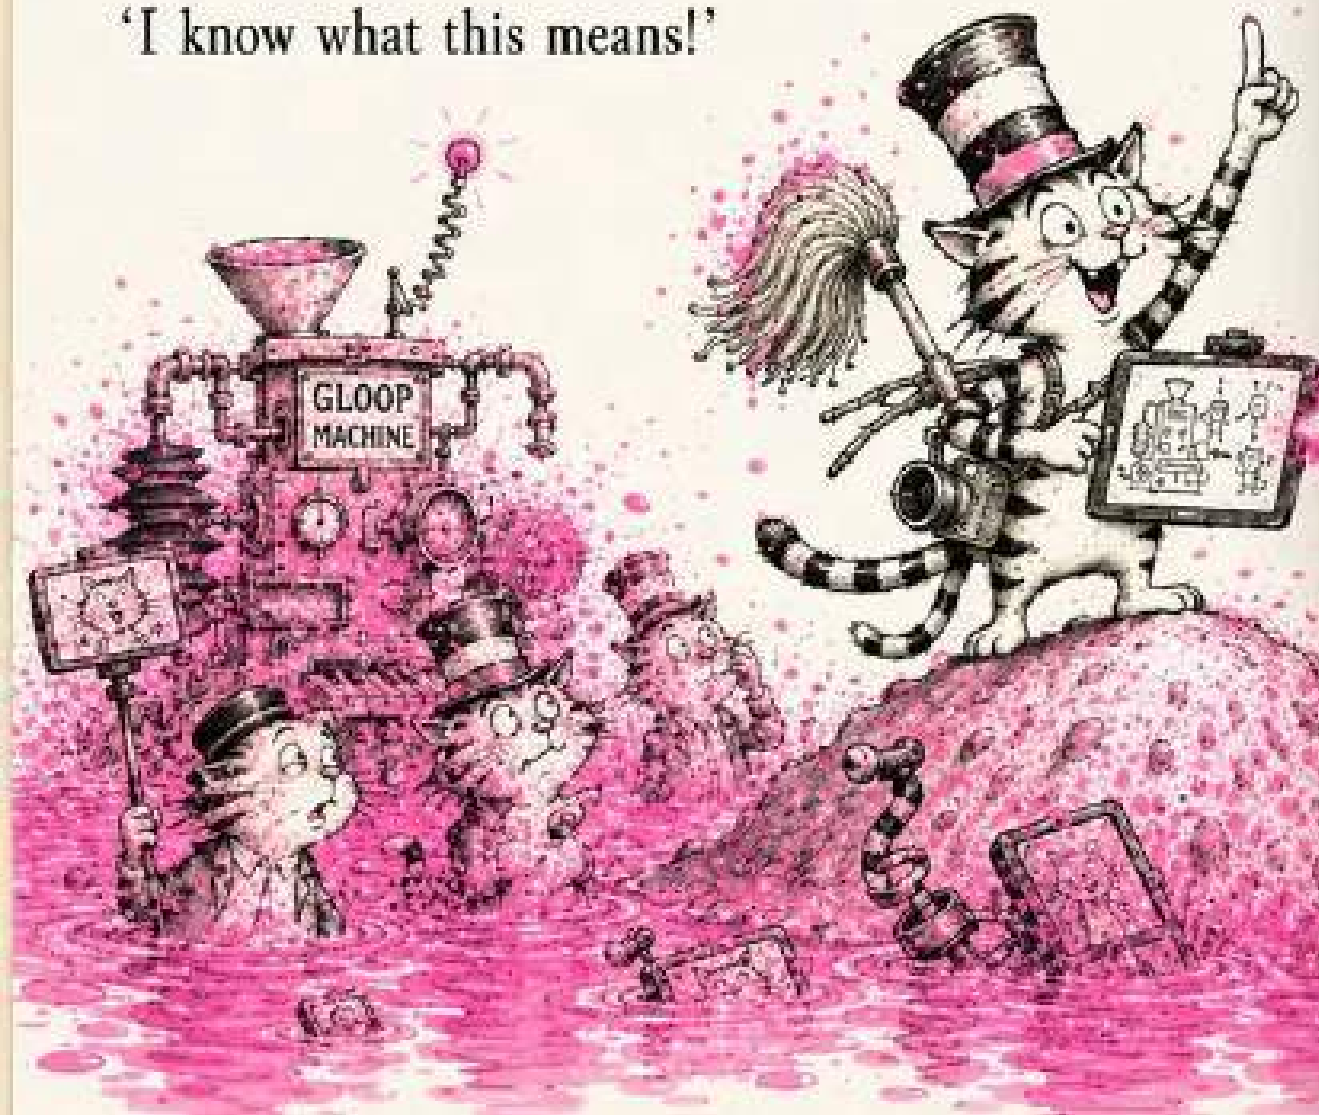

Then who should come hopping,
delighted and free?

Little Cat H.
Unfortunately—

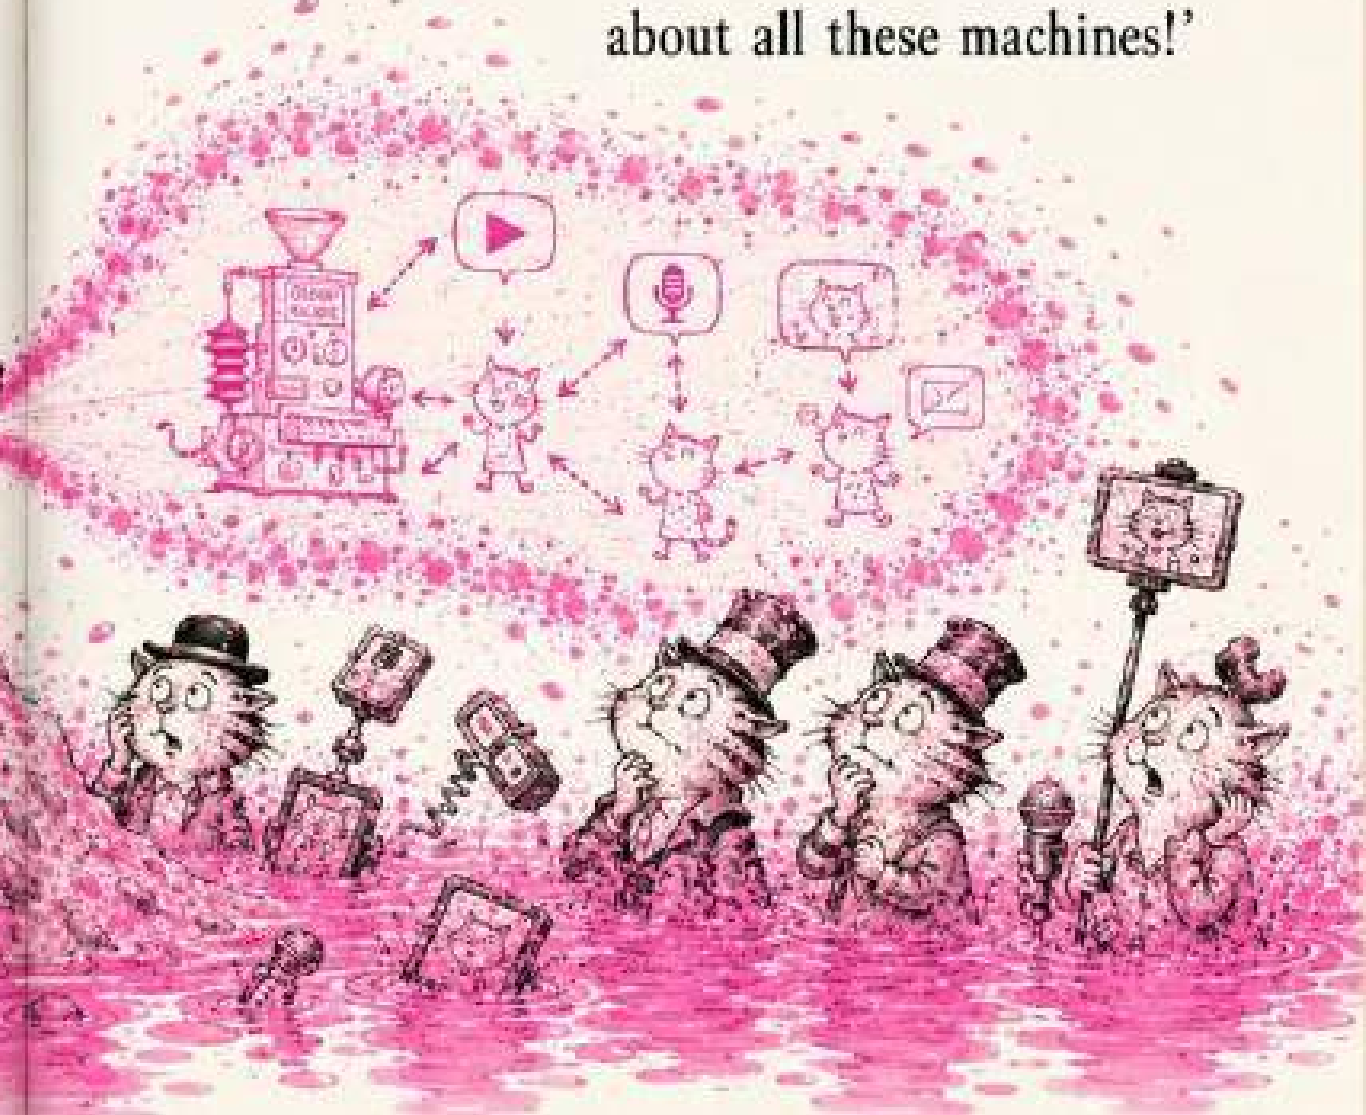

ME.

'I've solved it!' I shouted.
'I know what this means!'

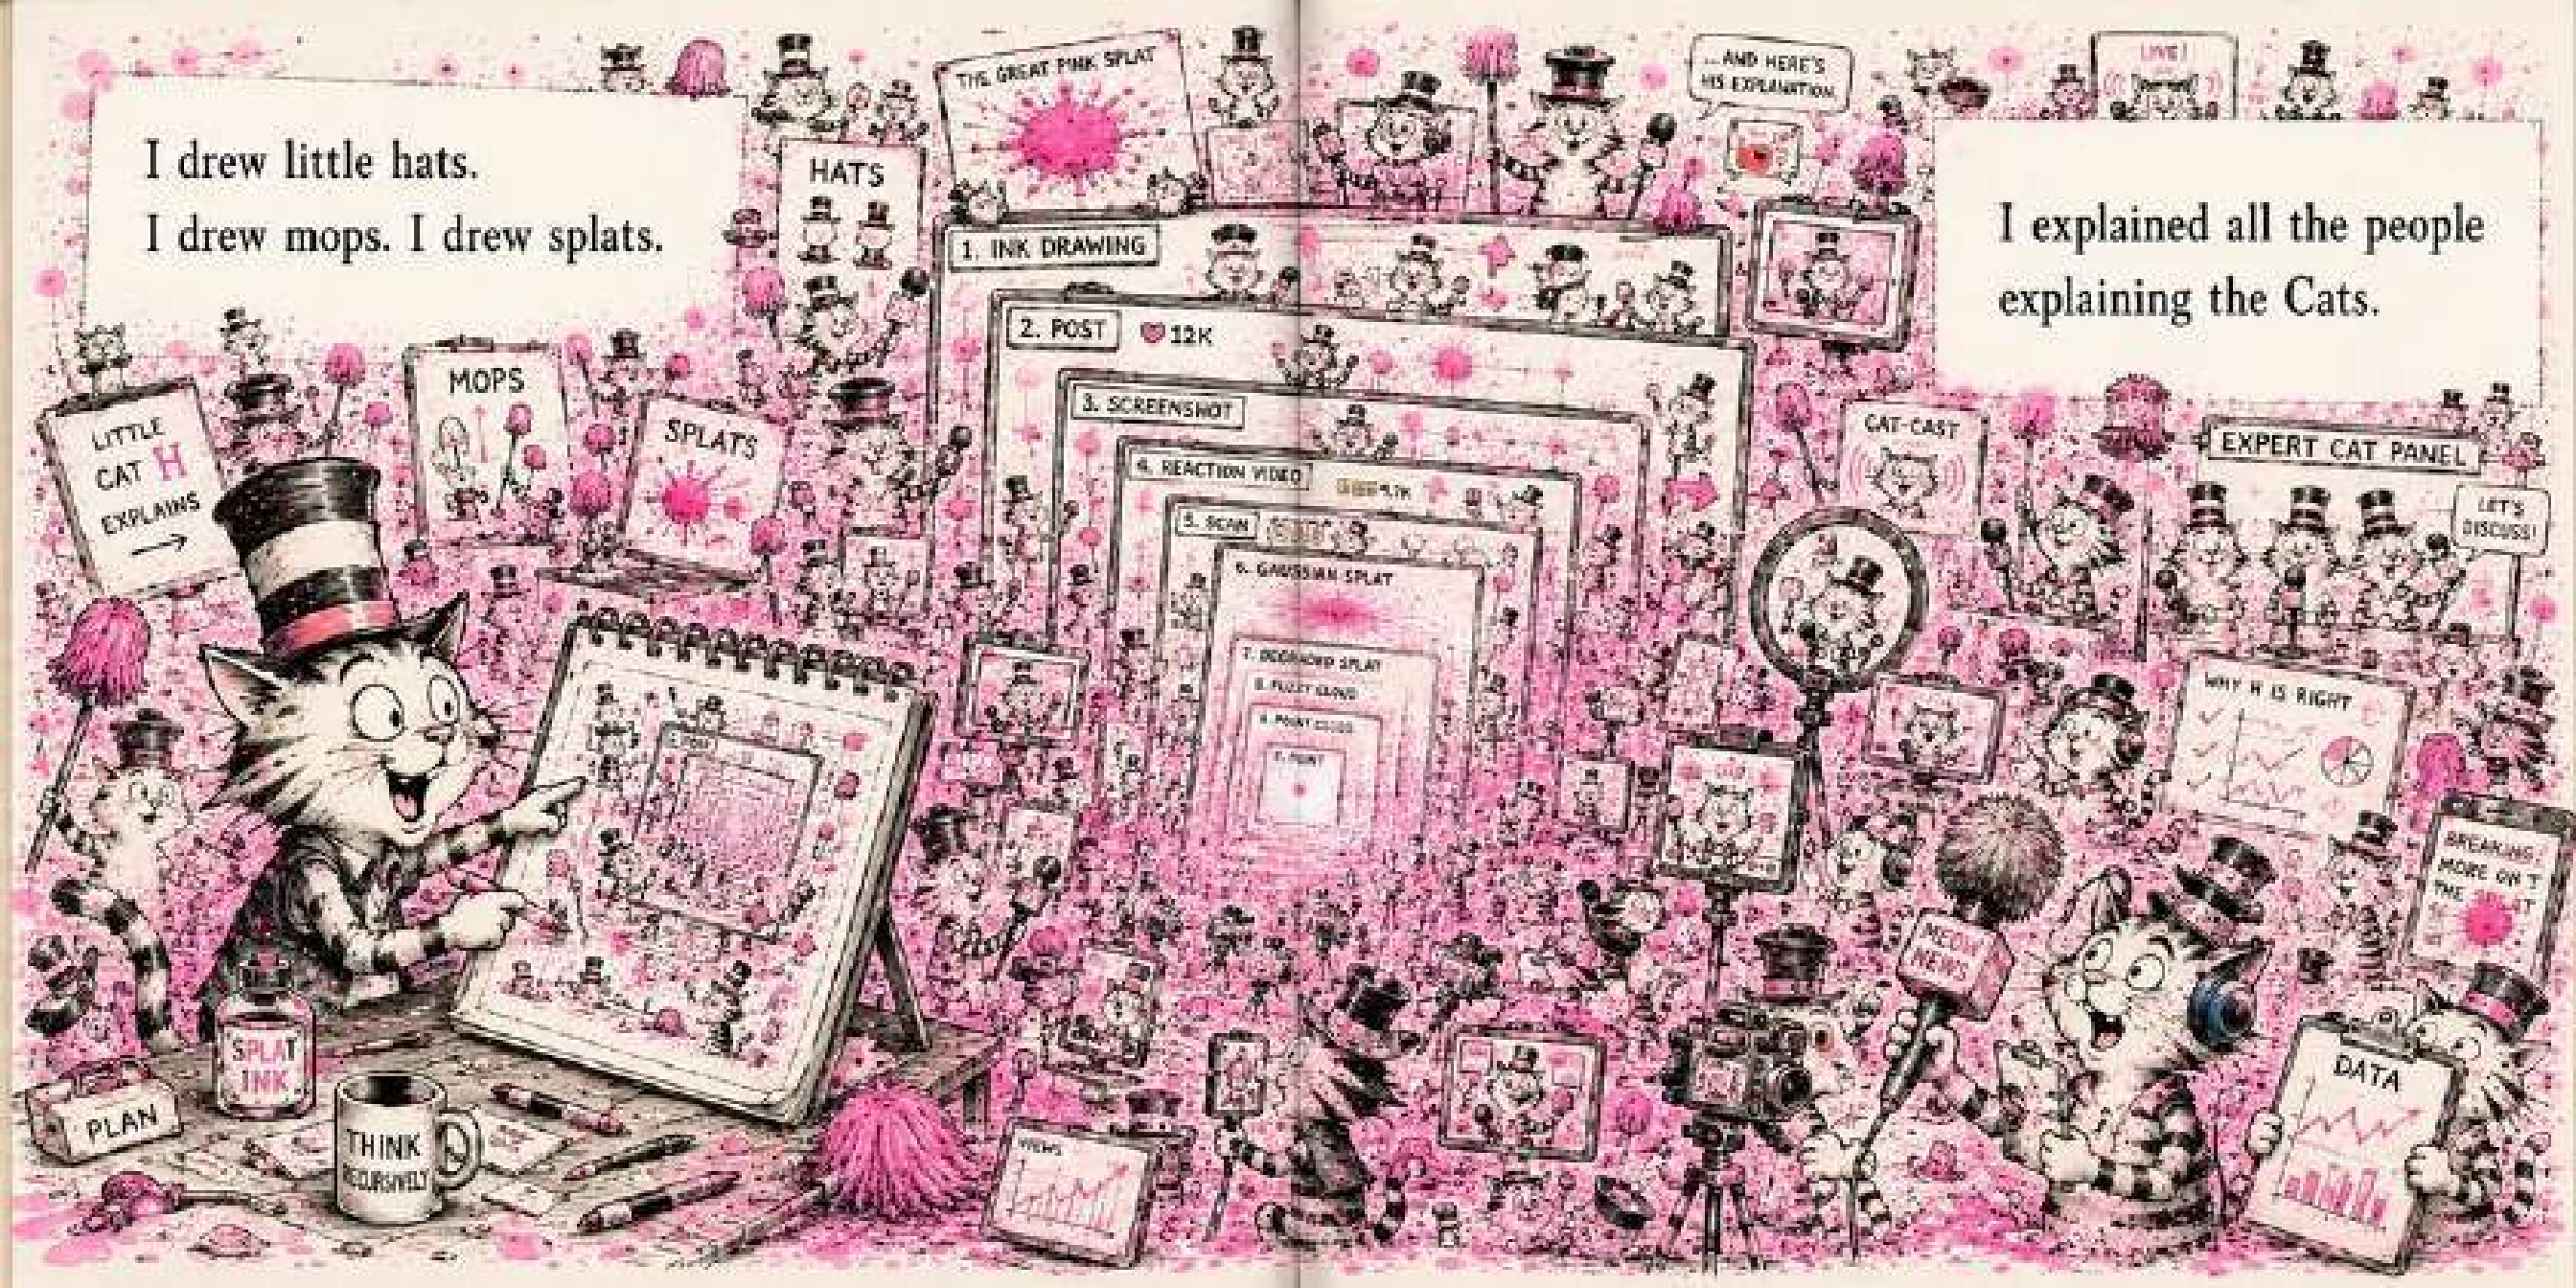

I'll make a smart meme
about all these machines!

I drew little hats.
I drew mops. I drew splats.

I explained all the people
explaining the Cats.

Then I looked at my hands.
Then I looked at my shoe.

Then I looked at the screen.
It was pink.
Mine was too.

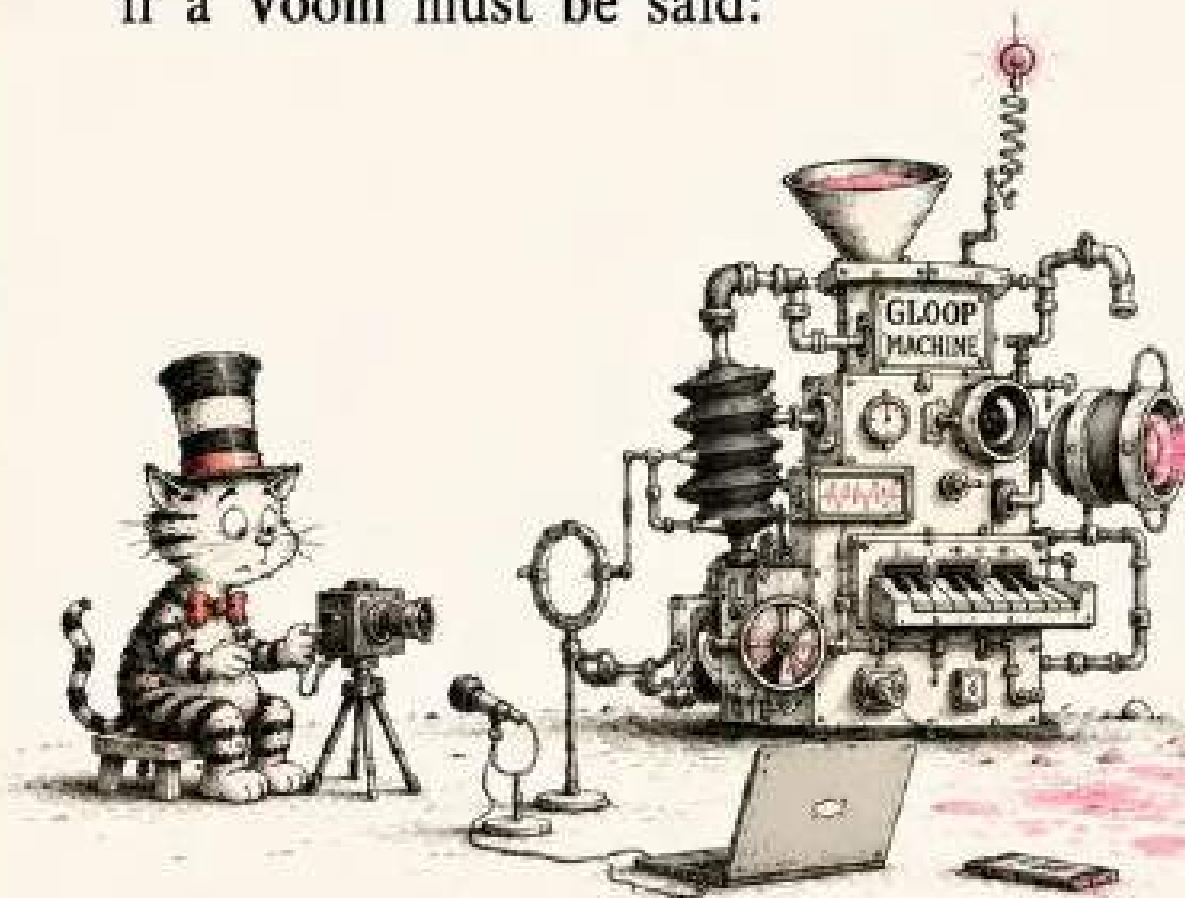

'Oh, shit,' I said softly.
'I'm one of them too.'

I smelled everybody —
then made more poopoo.

So here is the Voom,
if a Voom must be said:

Not every small thought
needs a post, clip, or thread.

If you haven't brought something more strange, true, or new than the thing you're complaining of—maybe don't do.

And if you still post it?

Fine.

I did, too.

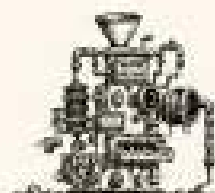

Just don't call it roses
when your own mop smells—

PHEW.

THE ACTUAL PINK SPLAT

This book began with a bond-market argument. On August 24, 2026, Stanley Druckenmiller published "Let the Bond Market Speak" in The Wall Street Journal. He was arguing about Treasury bond buybacks, long-term yields, and the temptation to soften a price signal because the signal is unpleasant. It was a narrow policy dispute with a clear object. Then somebody asked a different question. Did a machine write this?

A detector result began circulating. The op-ed changed species. It was still an argument about bonds, but it was also evidence in an argument about AI. The detector became a screenshot. The screenshot became a report. NOTUS called Druckenmiller and he confirmed that he had used AI. He compared it to a calculator and said the argument was his. The Wall Street Journal defended the piece. Then the Journal's newsroom reported on the controversy around the Journal's opinion page. The first object had produced a family of second objects.

THE MACHINE

From there the family got busy. Reporters covered the admission. Commentators made videos about authorship and writing as thought. Threads argued that undisclosed AI assistance was a breach. Counterthreads asked whether anybody should care if the writing was good. Newsletters pulled lessons from the dispute. Essays embedded earlier posts inside themselves. Podcasts discussed the fact that everyone was discussing the AI. One podcast complained that the bond argument had disappeared beneath the AI argument. That complaint became another artifact in the chain.

This is the Great Pink Splat. It does not require bad faith. It can grow from competent people doing ordinary work. A detector classifies. A reporter verifies. An editor explains. Another reporter reports the explanation. A critic gives the event a larger meaning. A podcaster notices that the event has become too large and says so into a microphone. Each step can add information. Each step also gives the event another surface on which to reproduce.

THE MOP

Little Cat H arrives when I arrive. I saw the chain and thought it should become a children's book. I drew the machine, the microphones, the charts, the hats, and the pink mess. That choice did not place me outside the system I was describing. It gave the system another object. The joke only closes when H looks at his own hand and finds it pink. Criticism can identify a pattern and still feed the pattern. Research can clarify a phenomenon and also preserve it. Satire can puncture the vanity of commentary while becoming commentary with better drawings.

The little rule near the end is intentionally modest. Bring something strange, true, or new. Build something. Test something. Repair something. Find an object that was not already waiting in the feed. If another explanation really helps, make it. Just know what you have made. Do not call the mop a rose because you dislike the smell coming from somebody else's bucket.

THE FOOTPRINT

The original argument about bonds is still there. So are the detector, the screenshots, the articles, the videos, the threads, the newsletters, the podcasts, the parody, this book, and now this note. None of them vanish because we recognize the recursion. The final pink point stays on the page for that reason. No explanation gets to erase its own footprint.

We regret to report that Little Cat H is real.

SOURCES

The op-ed began with bonds. These are some of the objects that followed it.

● WSJ OPINION

Stanley F. Druckenmiller, Let the Bond Market Speak

● PANGRAM

Detector result circulated for the op-ed

● NOTUS

Druckenmiller confirms using AI

● WSJ NEWSROOM

Druckenmiller's critique was delivered with the help of AI

● THEWRAP

The admission, the response, and adjacent AI-writing controversies

● NICHOLAS THOMPSON

Video and discussion on AI writing and authorship

● AXIOS

Stanley Druckenmiller makes AI writing a billionaire flex

● JORDAN SCHACHTEL

The Wall Street Slop Journal

● CURZIO RESEARCH

Why everyone is up in arms over Druckenmiller's AI op-ed

● TED MERZ

100 Percent AI

● HOWARD LINDZON

To Slop or Not To Slop

● LE SHRUB

Druck in the WSJ vs Shrub in the SSJ